Using Game Theory to Create a Powerful Context for Leadership

SEPTEMBER 17-18, 2015

Leading with high integrity requires stepping away from historical personal patterns. We are delighted to invite you to participate with a group of peers in a process which has proven remarkably effective.

You will learn to help your clients complete historical patterns that don't generate what they want through the use of game theory.

And, of course, you can use this process for yourself in creating your life and your practice.

Specific program outcomes:

- You will see how some of your clients' historical patterns still operate today as an "undeclared game." You will delve deeply into the game, including the rules created, the roles available and field of play.
- You will see clearly how this undeclared game is based on survival and not on generative leadership.
- You will see the ways that playing an undeclared game is making it impossible to win the game your client wants to be playing in life and in leading.
- You will identify both the embodied patterns and the social interactions that currently interfere with choice, gratitude and contribution. You will learn how to create practices that align with the fulfillment of the new game.
- You will learn how to support a client to complete the old game, and have them stop participating.

- You will support your client to design a delicious, compelling new game, choose a field of play and identify new roles for themselves and others.
- You will discover a new state from which your clients can operate, and identify simple moves to sustain their learning.
- You will practice with your colleagues:
  - the sustainable 'state' required to win the new game
  - the conversations which will keep your client and others in their newly designed roles
  - the actions you will take – and the actions your client will no longer take as they complete their undesired game
  - the "shape" which will enable your client to generate and sustain the 'body' of the new game.
